No knowledge of Philosophy is presupposed by the course at Cambridge. It is essential, however, to have done some advance reading, and this list is provided for guidance. The aim has been to list mainly works of original philosophy and to list only such works as can (with more or less effort) be understood by people new to the subject.

Classics at Cambridge involves the study of philosophy, history, art and archaeology, and linguistics as well as of the Greek and Latin languages and literature. To get an impression of what the advantages are of such integrated study, take a look at Mary Beard and John Henderson, Classics: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford, 1995).

This one, on Ancient Philosophy, is written by Julia Annas, who also wrote the Very Short Introduction book on Plato. This is a good general introduction to Ancient Philosophy. To my mind, it spent too much time off topic for such a short book - there was discussion on more general matters, and some topics not related to Ancient Philosophy as such.
